Even for people who don't believe in fortune telling (算命), it can be fun to learn about what fortune-tellers look at on a person's palm.

To read a person's future, a fortune-teller looks at both of the person's hands. The hand that a person uses for writing will show the things the person has done in life, and the choices he or she has made. The person's other hand will show the abilities the person born with, and his or her future.

In looking at each hand, fortune-tellers say that different lines on the hand stand for different things about a person's life. For example, they call the three major lines on people's hands the head line, the heartline, and the life line.

The head line represents intelligence. People with a long head line are said to have an excellent memory, while those with a short one are very intelligent. The life line represents health, and the longer it is, the healthier someone is. The heart line represents emotions and relationships—as a rule, the longer it is, the more important relationships are to that person.

Fortune-tellers also look at six minor lines, but quite a lot of people do not have one or more of the minor lines. The minor lines represent things such as the person's fate, wealth, health, marriage life and children. Fortune-tellers read these lines by looking at how deep and how long each line is.

In addition, fortune-tellers believe they can read information from the fingers of the hand. Each finger has a certain skill or fortune related to it. The thumb is related to love, the index finger to leadership, the middle finger to fate, the ring finger to art and imagination, and the smallest finger to communication. A fortune-teller will look at the length of each finger, how the finger bends, the size of the joints, and the shape of the ends of the fingers.
